College ERP from softNiche is a rather simple yet professional business management software for colleges and universities that will provide you with all the information you need about your students and incoming phone calls. For many years, the European Union has had very different positions in its foreign policy compared to the United States. In the mainstream, the EU is viewed as an activist power and as a proponent for humanitarian values such as the rule of law, human rights, democracy, and prosperity. More recently, however, the EU has taken a much more conciliatory approach. Although this approach is often criticized as being timid and lukewarm, it can, in fact, reflect the fact that the EU is now hesitant about acting on its own. It is also supported by opinion polls indicating that the majority of Europeans want the EU to take a less confrontational approach to other countries. Because of this, the United States seems to have the upper hand, but not because it is in the driver's seat. For various reasons, both the EU and the United States have agreed to work together on a number of topics. For example, they have worked together to fight the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, plan for the protection of civil aviation, and preserve international peace and security. But while the United States always has the dominant role in world politics, it does not mean that the United States cannot work as part of a coalition. Indeed, the period ahead of the new millennium has witnessed the emergence of an alternative coalition: The anti-war coalition. As Jean Bethke Elshtain has argued, "The United States has supported much that has gone wrong in the past" (Elshtain 2005). As a result, the international community has taken a view that the United States is not sufficiently trustworthy. This view is especially prominent with regard to U.S. foreign policy, but it is also important with regard to domestic political affairs and other social dimensions of the United States. Indeed, this is the source of the left's growing indignation about the U.S. government. The so-called "Iraq debate," for example, confirms that the lack of trust in the U.S. government is more than just an issue of foreign policy. Nor is it just the case that the left is outraged about Iraq. Nationalism is an important issue in the making of public opinion in many nations. In the United States, this is particularly the case with the Democratic Party, which has traditionally been associated with internationalism. But this means that the global
